Comment on the Bank of Scotland Survey

Commenting on the Bank of Scotland survey which shows an increase in the proportion of Scots who believe work-placed training or apprenticeships offer the best career prospects, Shona Struthers, Chief Executive of Colleges Scotland, said:

“We welcome the growing recognition among Scots of the value and benefits provided by apprenticeships and work-based training as an effective route into a successful career as colleges play such an important role in their delivery. It is also encouraging to see that young people are becoming more aware of all the options available to them as there are now many routes into employment.

“Colleges across Scotland offer a diverse range of courses and work in partnership with schools, universities, and employers to provide nationally recognised learning pathways. Studying at colleges provides people with terrific opportunities to train, retrain, develop work-ready skills, and progress into rewarding employment.”
